RESEARCH PROFILE

International Relations scholar working on international security, political order, Global China, and Taiwan. My research examines how security, legitimacy and political order are produced and sustained in practice, drawing on multilingual, fieldwork-based research across East Asia and Africa, particularly where formal structures are weak, contested or politically ambiguous. One strand develops a relational approach to security from ethnographic research on Chinese actors in conflict-affected South Sudan, extending to peacebuilding, microgeopolitics and China's evolving security role in the Arab world. A second examines the making of political identity and community in Taiwan, particularly through transitional justice, memory and contested sovereignty, with related work on recognition, diplomacy and Taiwan–Somaliland relations.

Research areas: international security; relational security; Global China; conflict and peacebuilding; microgeopolitics; political and regional order; China in Africa and the Arab world; Taiwan and the Indo-Pacific; recognition and diplomacy; qualitative, multilingual and fieldwork-based methods.
